The work of Public Health Nurses (PHNs) impacts individual, family, and communities on multiple levels. PHNs strive to ensure individuals, families, and communities have the tools to improve health outcomes and achieve optimal health. To meet this goal, the role of PHNs has continued to evolve solidifying their role in achieving health equity and social and environmental justices. Join nursing leaders in academia and practice from across California to continue the discussion, introduced during the 2019 Spring DPHN conference, to enhance the preparation of the future nursing workforce in serving patients and their communities.

Who should attend:

Nurse educators, public health nurses, state and local health department staff, members of community-based organizations, and others interested in the preparation of the future nursing workforce.
